Not illustrated. 1890 Excerpt: . being granted, I convinced the House, and the proviso was received.1 These and many such blundering passages would make one sick of public business there. It must be a warm zeal for the common good that must inspire a good man to act in those walls honestly. So many rubs, affronts, and scratches will meet with him as shall make his heart ache. Nay, it is strange, considering how disorderly Bills pass, that common sense comes out. Everyone offers his conceit for wording clauses, and many without much attention to the connexion, and others as supine to let it pass. But enough of this sorrowful reflection. 236. It was not long before the rising of the Parliament that a Bill for a register of estates was brought in. This Bill was much opposed, and particularly by the gentlemen of the gown; and to say truth none else are capable to make objections, which makes it thought that such are for the most part against the thing, affixing the reason as hindering lawsuits. I am sure I was for the thing, though not for that Bill, which was open enough to objection, and I spoke so long and so warm in it that the House thought fit to order a committee to meet during the recess and to prepare a Bill upon the debate, and recommended it to me to take care of it. I shall not here deliver my model and reasons, because it is...
