It is doubtless possible to develop and maintain strains of swine at relatively high levels of inbreeding, say as high as 40, 50, or 60 percent. A cross between certain of these inbred individuals would very likely produce excellent crossbred pigs. But this occurrence, would in itself give no assurance whatever that other individuals in future generations of these lines, even tho maintained at the same level of inbreeding, would also produce desirable crossbreds. Maintaining a given level of inbreeding, a relatively easy thing to do, will not guarantee uniform breeding results. Uniform results require the maintenance of the same genetic constitution from generation to generation, an achievement that is impracticable, if not impossible, owing to the biparental method of reproduction in swine.
