Excerpt: . of her time between her toilet and quadrille, was so little qualified for partaking a conversation so refined as Arabella s, that her discourse appeared quite tedious to her, since it was neither upon fashions, assemblies, cards, nor scandal. Her silence, and that absence of mind which she betrayed, made Arabella conclude she was under some very great affliction: and to amuse her, after dinner, led her into the gardens, supposing a person whose uneasiness, as she did not doubt, proceeded from love, would be pleased with the sight of groves and streams, and be tempted to disclose her misfortunes while they wandered in that agreeable privacy. In this, however, she was deceived: for though the young lady sighed several times, yet, when she did speak, it was only of indifferent things, and not at all in the manner of an afflicted heroine. After observing upon a thousand trifles, she told Arabella, at last, to whom she was desirous of making known her alliance to quality, that these gardens were extremely like those of her father sin-law, the Duke of, at . . . At this intimation, she expected Arabella would be extremely surprised; but that lady, whose thoughts were always familiarized to objects of grandeur, and would not have been astonished if she had understood her guest was the daughter of a king, appeared so little moved, that the lady was piqued by her indifference: and, after a few moment s silence, began...
