Samples follow -- Sample One: Glasses Two panes, fattened to correct my focus: a plastic truss across my eyes, bridged at my nose to make me see the world the way it really is; one day I may find a pair that work. Sample Two: The Breath of New Jersey I still know the breath of New Jersey, the tin-pan howl of Conrail freights that slash the air with warning strobes like machetes at the stalks of dark, then burst onto the Madison Street grade, each locomotive larger than the Foodtown and blacker than a spade in ink-lets of dust. Night sinks quickly in New Jersey, atop the wailing tractor-trailers swimming Turnpike, spastic, chilled to the frame, fighting up-stream like salmon to spawn their loads in Newark, Paterson, and Hackensack, stone cities gone ash in fields of weed that crust their factories like barnacles on a blue whales snout. Look to the rivers of pitch for the detritus we spit out! 61 In New Jersey the leaves all wear a tired film of...
