Excerpt: . . . given, as well as equal to the given figure. It therefore becomes necessary, that the given figure must not be greater than a figure described on half the line, as it must be similar to the defect. This is a new property, useful and entertaining; the Professors is only the 6th Prop. book 2d, brought forward in an awkward form, and here a mere nonentity, as it brings no information. Doctor Simson, in his notes upon these propositions, by way of illustration, adds some propositions of a more simple form; but so far from being intended to supersede the use of the 28th and 29th, expresses himself thus: These two problems, to the first of which the 27th is necessary, are the most general and useful of all the Elements, and are most frequently made use of by the ancient geometers in the solution of other Problems j and therefore are very ignorantly left out by Tacquet and DeChales, in their editions of the Elements, who pretend that they are of no use. Dr Keil, in his preface to the 7th edition of his Euclidj says, Some very good geometricians not darinir to make u new elements, have deservedly preferred Euclid to all others; and have accordingly made it their business to publish those of Euclid. But they, for what reason I know not, have entirely omitted some propositions, and have altered the demonstrations of others for worse. --Among whom are chiefly Tacquet and...
