"This book provides perspectives on interlinkages between fertility, mortality, contraception, reproductive health, and socio-economic and cultural factors in slum population groups in Delhi. Multivariate analysis of survey based data from five selected slums of Delhi reveals strong interconnections amongst crucial demographic parameters namely marriage-age, fertility, contraception, fetal-wastage, and infant and child mortality. Thereby the study reveals linkages between the demographic parameters and critical components of reproductive and child health (RCH) care viz. antenatal and delivery care utilization, children's immunization and women's reproductive tract infections. Furthermore, the study reveals that the demographic and the RCH components get influenced not only by socio-economic parameters like female employment and education, husbands' Occupational hierarchies, standards of living, etc. but also by cultural factors like religious and caste affiliations, and deep rooted son-preference in the Indian society." Econometric analysis in the study facilitates prioritization of RCH components like antenatal and delivery care and children's immunization bearing strong impacts on neonatal and post neo-natal components of infant mortality, and child and maternal mortality, which in turn bear significant and inhibitive impact on wanted component of total fertility. Furthermore, informed choice of contraceptives usage facilitates drastic reduction in unwanted component of total fertility. Authors provide conclusive evidence that women's education and gainful employment and alleviation of deep...
